Weekend Ruminations

T N Niran

The Apartheid Society

Only Pancharatna Raj will help improve service delivery as it goes with the grain of Indian society

OPINION

EXPERT OPINION

Deepak Lal

The Crisis of Identity Proofs

Laying stress on stress

Perspective

Sathnam Sanghera

The Break-Up

View Berlin, 1989, and after

B EEN Mahbub, a tribalthor from Hazarabagh, Bihar, left a note for his next of kin on his fridge door. It read: ‘In a lifetime of struggle in bed of coal dust, I have died. Please bury me. My name is not here. I have no identity. I am not a citizen of this country. I have no means to sustain myself. I am too old to work. I have worked for nothing. I have hardly seen my family. I have died.’ Mahbub was a victim of coal dust poisoning. He had worked for more than 35 years in a coal mine. Today, the story of Mahbub is repeated in thousands of coal mines across the country. The pain and suffering of workers in the mining sector is not uncommon. It is a common occurrence across various industries. The issue of identity proofs is a critical one, and it has been a significant problem for many years. The situation is particularly acute in the coal mining sector, where workers often lack access to basic services such as education, health, and sanitation. It is essential to address this issue and provide proper identification to workers. This is crucial not only for their personal wellbeing but also for their family and community. It is a matter of human rights and dignity. The government needs to take immediate action to ensure that every worker has access to proper identity proofs. This will not only help in addressing the issue of poverty and inequality but also in promoting social justice and human rights. It is time to prioritize the needs of these workers and ensure that they are able to access basic services and live with dignity. The government needs to work towards this goal and ensure that every worker has access to proper identification. This is a crucial step towards improving the lives of these workers and ensuring their well-being.

The Crisis of Identity Proofs

Laying stress on stress

Perspective

Sathnam Sanghera

The Break-Up

View Berlin, 1989, and after

B EEN Mahbub, a tribalthor from Hazarabagh, Bihar, left a note for his next of kin on his fridge door. It read: ‘In a lifetime of struggle in bed of coal dust, I have died. Please bury me. My name is not here. I have no identity. I am not a citizen of this country. I have no means to sustain myself. I am too old to work. I have worked for nothing. I have hardly seen my family. I have died.’ Mahbub was a victim of coal dust poisoning. He had worked for more than 35 years in a coal mine. Today, the story of Mahbub is repeated in thousands of coal mines across the country. The pain and suffering of workers in the mining sector is not uncommon. It is a common occurrence across various industries. The issue of identity proofs is a critical one, and it has been a significant problem for many years. The situation is particularly acute in the coal mining sector, where workers often lack access to basic services such as education, health, and sanitation. It is essential to address this issue and provide proper identification to workers. This is crucial not only for their personal wellbeing but also for their family and community. It is a matter of human rights and dignity. The government needs to take immediate action to ensure that every worker has access to proper identity proofs. This will not only help in addressing the issue of poverty and inequality but also in promoting social justice and human rights. It is time to prioritize the needs of these workers and ensure that they are able to access basic services and live with dignity. The government needs to work towards this goal and ensure that every worker has access to proper identification. This is a crucial step towards improving the lives of these workers and ensuring their well-being.

The Crisis of Identity Proofs

Laying stress on stress

Perspective

Sathnam Sanghera

The Break-Up

View Berlin, 1989, and after

B EEN Mahbub, a tribalthor from Hazarabagh, Bihar, left a note for his next of kin on his fridge door. It read: ‘In a lifetime of struggle in bed of coal dust, I have died. Please bury me. My name is not here. I have no identity. I am not a citizen of this country. I have no means to sustain myself. I am too old to work. I have worked for nothing. I have hardly seen my family. I have died.’ Mahbub was a victim of coal dust poisoning. He had worked for more than 35 years in a coal mine. Today, the story of Mahbub is repeated in thousands of coal mines across the country. The pain and suffering of workers in the mining sector is not uncommon. It is a common occurrence across various industries. The issue of identity proofs is a critical one, and it has been a significant problem for many years. The situation is particularly acute in the coal mining sector, where workers often lack access to basic services such as education, health, and sanitation. It is essential to address this issue and provide proper identification to workers. This is crucial not only for their personal wellbeing but also for their family and community. It is a matter of human rights and dignity. The government needs to take immediate action to ensure that every worker has access to proper identity proofs. This will not only help in addressing the issue of poverty and inequality but also in promoting social justice and human rights. It is time to prioritize the needs of these workers and ensure that they are able to access basic services and live with dignity. The government needs to work towards this goal and ensure that every worker has access to proper identification. This is a crucial step towards improving the lives of these workers and ensuring their well-being.

The Crisis of Identity Proofs

Laying stress on stress

Perspective

Sathnam Sanghera

The Break-Up

View Berlin, 1989, and after

B EEN Mahbub, a tribalthor from Hazarabagh, Bihar, left a note for his next of kin on his fridge door. It read: ‘In a lifetime of struggle in bed of coal dust, I have died. Please bury me. My name is not here. I have no identity. I am not a citizen of this country. I have no means to sustain myself. I am too old to work. I have worked for nothing. I have hardly seen my family. I have died.’ Mahbub was a victim of coal dust poisoning. He had worked for more than 35 years in a coal mine. Today, the story of Mahbub is repeated in thousands of coal mines across the country. The pain and suffering of workers in the mining sector is not uncommon. It is a common occurrence across various industries. The issue of identity proofs is a critical one, and it has been a significant problem for many years. The situation is particularly acute in the coal mining sector, where workers often lack access to basic services such as education, health, and sanitation. It is essential to address this issue and provide proper identification to workers. This is crucial not only for their personal wellbeing but also for their family and community. It is a matter of human rights and dignity. The government needs to take immediate action to ensure that every worker has access to proper identity proofs. This will not only help in addressing the issue of poverty and inequality but also in promoting social justice and human rights. It is time to prioritize the needs of these workers and ensure that they are able to access basic services and live with dignity. The government needs to work towards this goal and ensure that every worker has access to proper identification. This is a crucial step towards improving the lives of these workers and ensuring their well-being.

The Crisis of Identity Proofs

Laying stress on stress

Perspective

Sathnam Sanghera

The Break-Up

View Berlin, 1989, and after

B EEN Mahbub, a tribalthor from Hazarabagh, Bihar, left a note for his next of kin on his fridge door. It read: ‘In a lifetime of struggle in bed of coal dust, I have died. Please bury me. My name is not here. I have no identity. I am not a citizen of this country. I have no means to sustain myself. I am too old to work. I have worked for nothing. I have hardly seen my family. I have died.’ Mahbub was a victim of coal dust poisoning. He had worked for more than 35 years in a coal mine. Today, the story of Mahbub is repeated in thousands of coal mines across the country. The pain and suffering of workers in the mining sector is not uncommon. It is a common occurrence across various industries. The issue of identity proofs is a critical one, and it has been a significant problem for many years. The situation is particularly acute in the coal mining sector, where workers often lack access to basic services such as education, health, and sanitation. It is essential to address this issue and provide proper identification to workers. This is crucial not only for their personal wellbeing but also for their family and community. It is a matter of human rights and dignity. The government needs to take immediate action to ensure that every worker has access to proper identity proofs. This will not only help in addressing the issue of poverty and inequality but also in promoting social justice and human rights. It is time to prioritize the needs of these workers and ensure that they are able to access basic services and live with dignity. The government needs to work towards this goal and ensure that every worker has access to proper identification. This is a crucial step towards improving the lives of these workers and ensuring their well-being.